

From Sarah Brown McCulloch's Guilford: A Walking Guide (2012):

Methodist Church, 65-67 Whitfield Street, 1839.

One year after the Methodist Society was founded, its members were able to build a handsome Greek Revival building and, in 1869, to add an impressive portico with pillars. The building has now changed almost beyond recognition, but there are still signs of the church it used to be. If you look down the little street between it and the store on the north side, you can see where the windows were. Look up to the second story and notice the tops of the original pilasters peeping out above the awning roof. The society was disbanded in 1920 and since then the building has housed many different businesses.
