

From Sarah Brown McCulloch's Guilford: A Walking Guide (2012):

David K. Parmelee, 93 Water Street, Federal, 1835.

This house seems to have been raised from its original foundations and a simple stone stairway built to reach the now-high entrance. Notice the semielliptical window in the gable, a Federal fashion still hanging on well into the Greek Revival period. The triangular porch hood with pendants and delicate scrollwork is a late nineteenth-century addition. David Kirtland Parmelee was a direct descendant of John Permely, one of the founding settlers. He went to sea at a young age and was owner and captain of various small fishing vessels until his late sixties, sailing mostly between Guilford, Long Island, and New York. He and his wife, Sarah Stone, had five children, one of whom, Frank, began his career as assistant lighthouse keeper on Faulkner's Island. David died in 1903, aged ninety years and ten months.
